* SHORT STORY OF THE DAY.

••••••••••• • ••••••••• IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN.

From the Brooklyn Standard Union.
"Doloo far niente-a sweet doing nothing. I shall pin that to the catalogue of mem-ory's pictures painted here." She looked up at him and laughed. She always laughed. Their eyes met, then parted, and a vague sense of anticipated loss came to him with the realization of her near departure.

The mystic beauty of the twinkle hushed them into unwanted silence, and the tinkle of the sheep and cow hells rhymed into reminiscent memories thoughts of other day's when they had watched the sun fade away in the west. The fields, whose greenness was accentuated by lines of red Virginia soil, guarded by deeper green fir trees silhouetted, tall and sentinel-like, in the far background seemed to be softly waiting tackground, seemed to be softly waiting for the coming night.

"You will forget all this. As for me, I will only be one more in your collection," he smiled, evidently a willing victim,

"Collection—of sticks?" she interrogated, laughingly.

"You are unkind," he protested,

"You are unkind," he protested,

"You think, then, my remembrance of a very charming winter, like pricked bubbles, will vanish into space?"

Her face flushed and a shadow deepened her brown eyes. He was looking intently at a number of holes punched in the sand with her parasol. She caught her breath as she crushed the laces of her gown against her side—a characteristic gesture—then she characteristic gesture-then she ve seen each other every day, if only we've seen each other every day, if only a few moments, during nearly two onths, meeting with perfect frankness d, I thought, friendship. If it has all en insincere, I shall forget."

Insincere?" He leaned nearer, saying ty: "You have made me care too much, in the North there will be other interis in your life, crowding me out, until I shall fade into the dim corridors of the shall fade into the dim corridors of the past."

She noted the square, strong chin and mouth and the little wrinkles that caught around the smiling eyes. He could thus lightly toss aside the recollection of drives, of wheeling down shaded country roads which were, he had said, "like a benediction," and the evenings when he saing with delicate insinuation and emphasis about "you dear," and "love." All these thoughts pricked her mind. If she could only forget him:

TO RENT-HOUSES.

"Really, you seem most insistent to be-come merely a polka-dot in my memory. Don't you think, even then, I could always spot you?"

Her companion groaned. der companion groaned.

Her companion groaned.

"Jest if you must; but stay, ah, stay, fair lady, on this perfect day! I promise to do anything—say anything, if you will not go."

"You wax quite poetical," sweetly. "There is the silver moon for the second verse."

"Thanks for the suggestion"—rather stiffly.

"Come: my hostess will think I am lost."

"When a woman will, she will."

He refluctantly followed. They walked home through the soicy, fragrant pines, whose melancholy soughing filled them both with an undefined sadness.

"This must be good-by. I leave on the early train to-morrow, and never see people at the station. It makes me blue."

She stood on the steps with one hand extended. The stars flashed brightly, and the faint moon cast a soft light over her. Looking up at the little rebellious curls blown about under the wide, black hat, he felt an irresistible desire to touch them, but only raised her hand to his lips.

"Auf wiedersehn. You have given me many happy days, and I shall always think of you in this lavender gown, the violets and these saucy, nodding feathers—just as you stand. You will surely come back—to us?"

"Perhaps."

"Perhaps."

Being a woman, she could not cry to him, but must stifle the pain and defy the might-have-been, as she saw this man drifting out of her life. One's heart does not break in these modern days.

Smiling bravely, she went wearily up the steps, then paused. Taking a few of the violets, she kissed them, and turning, called to him. He came back.

Somewhat confused, she pinned them on his coat.

They really belong to you," she ex-

They really belong to you," she explained.

The moon was hidden, and he could not see how pale she had grown. Going to her room she took down a photograph, softly whitspering: "To have loved and lost!" Both hands suddenly pressed against her heart, and the tears blindly fell unheeded as she sobbed on.

He knew he would miss her. She had been so jolly; always ready for a dance or a ride; knowing his favorite music and songs. Now that was all over. Rummaging through his desk he finally found a little package of notes. Leaning back in his deep chair, he carefully removed the elastic around them and leisurely read over the lines. Out from the sheets of one fluttered a withered violet. It fell unnoticed to the floor. In another he found a tiny spray of jessamine. She had worn a great bunch of it one night. These few he had begged for and had been denied until the next morning, when his request was granted with a few penitent words. They had been at the opera, and under the magic of the music he looked into her eyes, startled by their deep intensity. He could see them now. How really dear she was! Ah, well, she would come again.

He replaced the notes, struck a match.

would come again.

He replaced the notes, struck a match, carefully held it to a cigar, and unfolded the evening paper.
